Dickson statement on shantytown

By Michael J. Garrison and Andrew L. Fish

"We could see there was a trend with the first judge and one judge and an opportunity in appeal to try to appeal, we could do that and, we had the option of pleading guilty." Dickson admitted. But he decided, "If I went to trial and he found guilty, the conviction could be used against me at a future date." The judge originally said the group that they could face up to 30 days in prison and a $100 fine if the court found them guilty. Rosen said. Rosen thought the judge had hardly "corroborated" them into accepting his "sentence." After "our few hours in prison, we realized that the judge would not get into further details" because he felt that the current situation on the MIT campus was "very dangerous.""
