BATTLESHIP "GEORGIA" INSPECTED FRIDAY

Electrical Engineering Society Members Inspect The Entire Ship.

Last Friday afternoon thirty members of the Electrical Engineering Society inspected the battleship "Georgia," now undergoing repairs at the Charlestown Navy Yard. Through the courtesy of the officers, the men were given liberty of the entire vessel, and parties of four under the guidance of the chief electrician and his aids examined the intricate appliances of the ship.

The bridge and the coming tower with their duplicate control apparatus were first visited. The officers explained the engine room indicating system, which can be opened either electrically or mechanically. The parties were conducted into the main gun turrets where the system of hoisting ammunition from the magazine, and of ramming it into the twelve-inch guns by means of motors, was explained.

The central station contains the power plant of eight generators, six being of 50 K. W. and two of 100 K. W. capacity. The master gyro compass now used on all modern naval vessels was one of the most important machines inspected. The compass occupies but four or five cubic feet of space. It is run on a three-phase alternating current system, and the 54-pound flywheel revolves at a speed of 8600 revolutions per minute.

The radio set has a capacity of five kilowatts. The radius of communication is limited to five hundred miles.
