Spies and Lies

Genuine agents are everywhere, eager to gather scraps of news about ships, our men, and others. It is still possible to get such information through to Germany, where thousands of these fragments are sorted and systematized, and where each fragment is closely watched to see if it contains any news of importance.

But while the enemy is most industrious in trying to collect information, and his system elaborate, there are two other ways of getting what we want, and these are undoubtedly handed to him by the carelessness of loyal Americans.

One of these is the giveaway, the other the spoiling of an investigation. The first is of small importance. The innocent people who give away information to the enemy, or give him information he had before, are an irritation to the American public, and a matter of some regret to the government.

The second is more dangerous. If you wish to spoil an investigation, you may do so by giving it an incorrect or misleading start, or by keeping your mouth shut, and so preventing the work from being done.

When you are in contact with the enemy, you are in contact with your country in a very real sense. You are in contact with the enemy, and especially for the summer. If you are in uniform, you are in a position to do something for your country. If you are in the service of the American government, you are in a position to do something for your country. If you are in the service of the American government, you are in a position to do something for your country.
