Arthur D. Little '85 and Sec. Wilbur are Writers for Review.

Dr. Arthur D. Little, professor of Chemistry at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has recently been named to fill the post of Secretary of Leadership in the Optical Technology Review.

How the advances in the industry of lens-making have wrought the aesthetic of scientific inventors is illustrated with numerous specimens of the work of the Optical Technology Review. Dr. Arthur D. Little, de- signated by virtue of his affiliation with MIT, issued the New Lens for '90. The editorial, written in the spirit of the Conference, states Dr. Little's contributions to the design of the Optical Technology Review. The Conference has had previous training in publication and is sensitive to the position of the Optical Technology Review. Two departments are open to prosperous writers, the editorial department and the business department. The editorial department does not work all the content written in the weekly magazine. It solicits material for publication, provides instructions, handles the composition and mailing, and raises the print money.

The business department handles the business of T. E. N. The business manager is in charge of the business department.

What new opportunities are available in the Optical Technology Review?

The optical science is a field where the Optical Technology Review is expanding. The Optical Technology Review, a weekly magazine in the optical field, can expand its scope by the addition of new departments and writers. The Optical Technology Review should expand its scope by the addition of new departments and writers.

Not only the Optical Technology Review but also all other magazines and newspapers in the optical field are in need of writers. The Optical Technology Review, a weekly magazine in the optical field, can expand its scope by the addition of new departments and writers. The Optical Technology Review should expand its scope by the addition of new departments and writers.

In the Optical Technology Review the NNRS and Editorial are the two departments that have contributed to the growth of the Optical Technology Review. Pinch hitter

Don't make yourself unpopular by becoming a pinch hitter at any time, particularly when you're in a Parker Duofold, your hand is sore, and you have the point to a hundred dollars. Don't expose yourself. Make yourself invaluable to the team and chic the Parker Duofold that you have. When you feel you have prepared yourself for the position—then you may try for a pinch hitter's plan.

For no style of writing can fail, or be imitated. Even the Peugeot and the Compagnie des Saint-Étienne are no match for it. Still it rolls as easily as a true Parker Duofold.
