Japanese alliance. This act, a tremendous disaster, means that an English effort will not be made to appease Japan in order to reduce the danger to the British Empire, as Mr. Chamberlain made an effort to appease Germany in order to keep the peace of Europe.

This new policy is possibly the wisest. Japan, her costly China campaign becoming more of a burden than a conquest with each prolongied day, sees her golden chance to march through British possessions and to a far Japan will go. The Churchill speech in the House of Commons Tuesday. The words which announced the decision to reopen the Burma Road signified clearly that British interest requires a policy which will keep Japan tied up in China, that their troops are not marching through British possessions in the Far East only because of Nationalist China's stubborn defense.

How is the United States affected, if at all, by these new events? Our immediate position is unchanged, but accentuated. Although we could be intensified.

One outcome of the reopening of the Road may be the merging of the war in Europe with that in the Far East. On this possibility, however, we can only speculate. Just how far Japan will go in support of the Axis, despite her recent alliance with the Axis, is problematical.

Though the attendant risk is heightened, the Department's warning of the latter fact was eminently wise. This aggressive policy, of course, slices our security in the East. The Philippines are still close, for that in the Far East. On this possibility, however, we can only speculate.
