CLASS A RECOGNITION

The refusal of the Institute Committee to admit the Debating Society to Class A recognition has raised a great deal of discussion among the proponents of such a move.

That the proponents of Class A recognition for the societies in question should be disappointed is only to be expected in view of the work for a specific group, they want that group to be advanced as far as possible.

However, the Institute Committee evidently had good grounds for its refusal. These grounds center around the premise of permanence, yet unsupported, rather than in a disdain of the good work done by the Hobby Shop and the Debating Society. The Institute Committee has been the backbone of the body, its quality depending upon the quality of its component members, which, in the ultimate, are the member societies.

This year the Debating Society asks the highest recognition of the Institute Committee. It maintains that it represents the Institute, to the credit of the latter, at many outside functions. It says that it has a very active and widespread membership. No one disputes these statements.

But the Debating Society has existed more than a year. And its past record offers no evidence of such voracious activities. Instead it shows ten to twenty men, led by a nucleus of four or five, who debated in an unorganized manner. No one disputes these statements.

It is much to the credit of the present leaders of the Debating Society that they have been able to expand and remodel their club into a smoothly functioning organization. Yet the Institute Committee cannot risk Class A recognition on a society which has already had good grounds for its refusal. As Mr. McKenney pointed out, journalism's problem today is concerned over the choice of two lines of action: (1) Regular inter-collegiate varsity debates. (2) Radio debates once every two weeks.

It is the imperative ideal in normal times. Number 2 is fraught with danger, and requires intelligence and courage. But in war newspapermen take sides. It is something more than a pastime. During perplexing times just 'short of war' is a journalistic duty to take sides. I am assuming here, of course, that we have been derelict in failing to propagate the kind of way of living we want.

From these words, it's hard to suspect Mr. McKenney of being something of a pacifist. But the right of words to declare about one's beliefs with respect to a design for living, it is just as obvious that in certain societies such declarations can not always be made. In totalitarian nations the notion that opinions of any kind which are opposed to the regime can not be printed, is ridiculous; in other countries, competing publications, politics, public opinion, are often the factors exerting a large influence on what observations are made in a newspaper's columns.

What is important behind the whole situation is the recognition of the fact that journalism does not only face the problem of censorship. Freedom of the press—
