The CASE FOR THE BRONZE RAT

"Is a ten year ring tradition worth dashing for with no decisive question about it?" This is the problem that must be solved at tomorrow's Junior-Junior Ring Pull, where the present Beaver ring and proposed ring future service will stand trial.

Although the present ring may look a little weird from the old rats, because of its highly polished surface, we don't believe that it is sufficiently better to warrant breaking a well-established and long time system of rings of the same design, but with their surfaces executed differently. Experience has shown that the polished surface used on the new ring scratches and wears very poorly.

On the other hand, the rough surface of the present ring wears particularly well, a fact which should impress us as future engineers who will soon be doing our hands in sulfurous acid, or on some other material.

In spite of the many assertions cast upon the bronze rat, the present ring design remains superior, and we feel that it will be able to get by in the best of circles. Nevertheless we are still progressive enough to believe that the ring from now on will be made from a different material, or at least be made from a different kind of tin.

We can't say that the experience of tomorrow will not be as exciting as the automobile of today. But before the engine revs loudly, must we occupy ourselves with developing necessary controls, in order to shut off an engine, or in order to get the engine started? Must we be in constant dread of losing our money, or in fact, of losing our lives? Must we not think twice before driving a car in traffic conditions that are not as smooth and comfortable as those we have been used to in our own cars? Must we not think of the maintenance of our car as a necessity, as we do with our average car?

To those who believe that the experience of tomorrow will not be as exciting as the automobile of today, we would say that the experience of tomorrow will be just as exciting as the automobile of today.

We believe that the automobile will be just as exciting as the automobile of today, and we believe that the experience of tomorrow will be just as exciting as the automobile of today.

Despite the fact that the experience of tomorrow will be just as exciting as the automobile of today, we believe that the experience of tomorrow will be just as exciting as the automobile of today.
