Letang. They are part of the instruments,—the machinery of the department,—and considering the comparatively slight expenditure which is made for the architectural course in this respect, the decision of the Committee is to be greatly regretted. Furthermore, in view of the fact that this department is more than self-supporting, it would seem that such a small expense should not be begrudged even during the great financial stringency. The architects are displeased with the decision, and at the present writing it is very probable that a mass meeting of the three upper years will be called to petition the proper authorities to secure the designs.
