To the Editors of The Tech:

As one interested in athletic events of all kinds at Technology, and particularly in baseball, I need offer no excuse for writing what I believe are the feelings, after the game at Williamstown, of every man in M. I. T. who has her athletic interests at heart.

The game has, in the first place, added another bit of evidence to the fact which was proved some time ago to heads fully as wise as those of the present time, that, under existing conditions at Technology, such as the shortness of the term and the early annual examinations, a 'Varsity baseball team is an impossibility.

Now, if there were enough enthusiasts here to make up a fairly representative team, the students as a body would give what support they deemed best, and no comment would be offered; but such an event as the game with Williams, cannot and should not pass unnoticed. That a college athletic management should, in the face of the existing sentiment at home and abroad, have the effrontery and dishonor to attach to him the name of a reputable player now in college, seems well nigh incredible.

The record of thirty-two hits for Williams and thirty-two errors for M. I. T., speaks only too plainly of the playing done. However, the defeat and score are of the least moment. That the team which went to Williamstown can play infinitely better ball than it did, no one doubts; and, moreover, anyone who knows anything about athletics knows that such a game was not brought out by the simple superiority of the Williams team. Enough has been said for those who read to know what the writer means. To sum up, the result is simply this,—the team has entirely discredited itself, and deserves no more support or sympathy from the student body. We can only lament that so much harm has been wrought to Technology’s otherwise fair reputation in athletics, at home and abroad.
