THE sad termination of Thursday's Cane Rush, resulting in the death of a fellow student, has cast a shadow of gloom and of mourning over the entire undergraduate body. The day of the Rush, which was looked forward to with so many eager anticipations of pleasure, will be remembered with none but feelings of most profound and penetrating sorrow. To the grief-stricken members of Hugh C. Moore's family who so bravely met and accepted their great loss, Technology offers its deepest and most heartfelt sympathies in their bereavement, of which the college begs a right to share.

OST of the Boston newspapers published accurate and merciful reports of the death of Hugh Moore on last Thursday. Conspicuous as the one which did not do this but, instead, harrowed the feelings of Tech men and their friends with a yellow journalistic picture was the Boston Post. The action of this publication must be most heartily condemned. Surely there will not always be papers of the type of which the Post is a good example, papers which depend for existence on the lowest of uneducated people, papers which hungrily seek just such an occasion as this from which the essence of their life, sensationalism, may be wrung. The mere apology for a defense made in a subsequent issue would be amusing if it did not again call up the disgusting description first published on Friday.

The action of the Institute Committee expressed the sentiment of the student body, and the general public cannot but have the same feeling. Let us hope that we have heard the last of the controversy which can but add to our sorrow.

The Thanksgiving number of The Tech will be issued next Wednesday, owing to the vacation.
