which the engineer in his work of construction, transportation and sanitation deals.

"Let me suggest another force of nature no less powerful, no less important—the dynamic importance of the social energy. The engineer must deal not alone with these material forces, he must deal each day and hour with that subtler force which makes contact possible between man and man; that sympathy and understanding of men which enables the leader to get out of men the best that is in them; the attitude of mind to enter into other men's thoughts and to share their point of view; the sense of fellowship which invites confidence; in a word, knowledge and fellowship with one's fellows. Let me urge upon you the fact that this also is one of the forces of nature, one of the greatest, and one with which you must reckon at every step of your work and at every point in your career. Of all the forces of nature what one might call the social energy, the dynamic value of a living, sympathizing, inspiring member of the social order is the greatest, and one which the engineer, therefore, cannot neglect."
