METHODS IN ARCHITECTURE.
 with men stronger than themselves, and they would more fully appreciate how much their own work stands for if they could watch more closely its theory put into practise by those who have had a year's start of them. The third and fourth year men now meet on a common ground. They help each other in many ways. They work on each other's drawings, and they criticize each other's designs. This association seems to develop more quickly their reasoning powers, and their ability to discriminate between good and bad in architecture and to express themselves clearly in words.
 In regard to the demand for men from the Architectural Department, both graduates and special students, Prof. Francis W. Chandler, head of the course, has made the following statement:
 "The greatest demand for men from Course IV is first for those who have passed the graduate year in the department. It is well understood in the profession the great value that this extra year makes for accomplished draftsmanship and skill in design. When the demand comes for such men, it is not asked whether they are practical or have had any office experience, but whether they have trained ability to size up a scheme and compose skilfully. With this is soon made up the deficiency of practical experience.

 "Still this class can only provide for a very small part of the demands. The regular graduate is prepared to be of immediate practical usefulness for he has, as a rule, spent the greater part of his vacations in an architect's office. His diploma stands, besides, for a school training in both the aesthetics and construction of architecture, and as an all-round man he is always wanted. The demands for men from the Course in Architectural Engineering are much greater than we can fill, and this demand seems also to increase steadily.
 "Generally the special student has had a first-rate training in office practice before coming to the Institute, to which he wishes to add the academic methods. He more often returns to the office from which he came than seeks a new one, but there are always enough opportunities for him, which may also be said of the undergraduate students. Architects are very willing and often anxious to have them in their offices during the summer time. They are able to make themselves useful in the regular office routine, and they will help fill the gaps occasioned by the vacations of the regular force.
 "Never yet has there been any difficulty in finding positions for our men, nor has the department ever been able to graduate a number of students sufficient to meet the demand."

IT IS NOT WHAT AN ENGRAVER OR AN ILLUSTRATOR CLAIMS to do but what they have DONE and what they are DOING that raises them in the estimation of the man who wishes RESULTS. We guarantee you something BETTER than you have had. The COST will be NOTHING to you. Think it over! It sounds good and WE MEAN IT.
