ster, Lord Kelvin and C. Cross. His name is Lyman Quince. He hails from somewhere down in the South, and he's the kind that he is responsible for the acquisition of erudition for his native county. In plain parlance, he is a 'Quinty.' His name is strong enough, and probably has some red blood in his body, even though it be well sujageulated. On those occasions when he appears at the meetings in our room he seems capable of conversing about general lines, but in the classroom his conversational effort is said to be limited to the one infernal question: WHY? Such are Mrs. Williamson's students. Divergent individually, yet homogeneous collectively, they are essentially a representative group of fellows. Every one of them, including myself, has his own ideas on various subjects, but what is more, everyone expresses those ideas, and where the most opposition to agreement is shown, there is the most emphasis laid. And the very diversity of our ideas I think, renders our talks the more profitable to all concerned.
