

PROF. SEDGWICK

fore setting it free.
The third general item of wastes is the solid matter. In England all such matter is collected together and burned. Here, however, we separate or try to separate the matter in to incombustible and combustible matter and garbage. The first class includes ashes, bottles, glass, etc; the second, paper, excelsior, etc.; and the third, swill and refuse from food. The trouble with the attempt to divide the waste into three classes is that it is impossible to get complete or even good separation. As a result ashes often contain garbage and paper. Moreover, they contain about 30 percent. of coal which might be sifted out and given to the needy poor. This has been done for financial profit in some places. The mixture of garbage with ashes, however, is dangerous, for it has been in contact with persons who have contagious diseases. Waitresses have spread typhoid by means of food, and as the ashes are handled they tend to spread disease. At the dump in the Back Bay near Simmons College there are clouds of flies attracted by the garbage, and these carry infection. When ashes are dumped into the sea a large part, as garbage and paper, float away and are a nuisance. Liners and yachts have thrown their ashes and waste overboard and been objectionable on that account. Moreover, birds eat this garbage and then come and use our drinking fountains, polluting them with their feet.

Prof. Sedgwick closed his lecture by asking whether we did not expect too much of the city in expecting it to take away the ashes of large institutions. The health of the city should be cared for, but the economical question should be considered in order that the former may be more truly cared for.
