Finally, and most important of all, an engineer should not injure the professional reputation of another in any manner. Very often what seems to be an error in judgment or mistake made by another can be explained by the peculiar conditions of the case. But even if it was purely a mistake one should consider himself fortunate not to have been made the same mistake himself, instead of trying to derive gain by malicious criticism. Furthermore, he should not try to take a position away from another, and should not accept any position where another man has been discharged, without first communicating with this person.

The engineer should always be as ready to praise good work on the part of his subordinates, and also the contractors, as to criticize faulty work. This is conducive to better work and better relations for all concerned, and makes it a great deal easier to superintend the work.

In common with all other professional men, an distinct from business men, it is very bad practice for the engineer to advertise other than by his plain business card. This arises primarily from the fact that the commodity to be sold is not a tangible object or merchandise, but personal services.

Some people have said that an engineer should not accept gifts, and favors from contractors, while not any such invention without the knowledge and consent of his client.

With regard to the accepting of gifts and favors from contractors, while not always leading to bad results, it is dangerous and should be avoided. If a contractor offers you a cigar, he is subject to any criticism. By this contract offers you a contract to advertise other than by his plain business card. This arises primarily from the fact that the commodity to be sold is not a tangible object or merchandise, but personal services.

PROF. SWAIN SPEAKS

Some people have said that an engineer should not patent any invention which he might make, but should give it gratuitously to the world. In this Prof. Swain disagreed, but said, however, that the engineer should not use any such invention without the knowledge and consent of his client.
