their suggestions, in obtaining statistic as to the results of the various vocations, what callings are overcrowded and what are comparatively empty. In these days, too, who are to amount to anything have usually to work in some science-intellectual or manual. If they cannot get happiness from their work, they are almost inevitably doomed to misery. It is indeed surprising that misery is not greater than it is when we consider the haphazard methods of choosing, just as it is surprising that there are not more unhappy marrieses.

There is waste everywhere; in processes of manufacture, due to unscientific methods; waste in distribution, due to like causes; but perhaps above all, waste due to misdirected human efforts, when men are working with all their energy in the wrong field. If we can do anything to diminish such waste, it is a national duty to make the nation wisely and do everything that we can.”
