AUSTIN DAM

Joints were poorly made, and the foundations were unprotected from water. The second consideration is the direction in which the resultant pressure acts on the foundation. If this pressure acts from vertically, it is a point near the lower edge of the beam a tendency to slide is produced. At Austin this pressure was so great as to be altogether too great for the resisting power of the underlying clay, and the dam slid. A third factor is the slight strength of horizontal layers of concrete when poorly bonded, even though iron tie rods be used to some extent. It was this fault which allowed the water to break a way through the dam at one end, as it was the fault of the foundations at the other.
