has ever been awarded the Thayer Medal, given for the world's greatest astronomical discovery made during a period of two years preceding the award. He has proved through his work, and shown in his book, that the heat from the sun is subject to variations which appreciably affect the temperature of the earth, and adds that the changes may be caused by differences in the transparency of the sun's envelope. This fact will be used by weather prophets as soon as the proper observatories can be equipped, for a difference in the radiation of five per cent is appreciably felt on the earth. He was for the first time in this line that he had awarded the honor, and his absolute proof that the difference in solar intensity was at least as great as eight per cent.
