MECHANICS' DINNER.

He then took up the M. E. Society and said that he thought that one of the best investments a man could make was his dues in an engineering society. He said that for many years past the officers of the society had gone out into the world and made good. The men got through the society, the power of moving men and handling men that is of immense practical value. And in conclusion he showed that the real society was the big engineers fool that time spent in making it a society is put to a good use. It is in the last year that the man has turned down an invitation to speak before the Mechanicals. Another hearty cheer from the men and the annual meeting was over.
