THE SUMMER JOB.

Among the multitude of classifications into which men of wit and wisdom have divided humanity it has been suggested that there are two kinds of men: one-half are always looking for a job, and the other half running away from it. We hope that the author of this does not seriously think that he means mathematical halves; however, he may never have had a visit to Tech.

To the Seniors the question of a job is of such an acute nature that we dare not run the danger of creating an explosion by any unfortunate slip-up. Therefore we will allow those perplexed persons to solve their own riddles; the best advice we can offer is that they read "Life" at least two or three times during the summer vacation, and to them we would address our remarks.

It has always happened that a varying proportion of the graduating class in the United States has been underemployed who plan to obtain pecuniary aid and valuable experience from work during the summer. But there has been a far larger proportion, during the summer vacation, and to them we would address our remarks.

It has always happened that a varying proportion of those finding employment at such a time have been underemployed who plan to obtain pecuniary aid and valuable experience from work during the summer. But there has been a far larger proportion, during the summer vacation, and to them we would address our remarks.
