THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

We have heard many men speak about the Institute asking for a new constitution for the Institute Committee as a whole, and it is not hard to see that they are the ones who have failed to read the various articles of the constitutions, and above all, the document itself, which has appeared from time to time for the last few weeks in these columns. These men are among those who will later be asked to vote on the question of rejection or adoption of this important matter, and are more than glad to see that their interest has been sufficiently aroused to the point of seeking information which will enable them to criticize and vote intelligently.

We have understood that the Constitution Committee will post copies of the proposed constitution in various buildings on the campus and we sincerely hope that all recognize that this opportunity of becoming thoroughly informed on the conditions under which this constitution is to be placed before the student body.

STUDENT RANO.

Among the names of those men who have not yet registered for Professor Bodwell's popular course in sanitary science, but who have been regularly attending the lectures, is that of P. H. Rand.

The Bursar occupies a prominent seat in front row during the lect- ure and stands out among all the others. It was very careless of him to neglect to register, and he tried coming in the midst of the whole thing. The Bursar's appearance is a living example of the famous old adage, "One is never too old to learn." Although he may be attending the lectures because of interest in the subject, there is a vague possibility that he may be a self-appointed committee to see whether Professor Bodwell's work's services are a paying investment.
