of the center of the plane, and there is a tendency for the rear of the plane to be pushed up and the nose to go down. As the angle decreases, the center of gravity of the plane approaches a vertical position, the wind strikes the front end of the plane and causes a pressure downward. This pressure is very apt to make the machine turn over. In a very aeroplane or biplane, turning is prevented by the lifting of the rudder, which, although it sometimes the machine, also stops it. This hot of speed is often very sudden and in consequence of inertia.
