MECH. ENG. SOCIETY

The main point was then brought out. The social arrangement of the work of the students carried out in great detail.

When Mr. Cory was introduced, the fellows were made known as "Dad" Cory, and at the conclusion of his talk several questions were put to the speaker. The first one was: Why are you known as "Dad" Cory? Some of the other questions were: How is it to be taken care of? How is the Christmas trade taken care of? Does the store bother the firm much? etc.

Professor Harvell was the second speaker of the evening, and he congratulated the men on their numbers. "Every man," said the Professor, "must have an ideal of the engineer he will be and work toward it."
The particular qualities of the group were those of the Institute. Its \"impressed Professor Harvell as being three important ones, and they were: first, originality; second, prepared; and third, courage. Every man who has these qualities has the attributes of a good engineer, and the most important of these is that of honesty. As a final shot the Professor read a political parody on "The Goblin Will Git Ye."

The next speaker was Professor Miller, who spoke on the advantages and difficulties of the Mechanical Engineering Society both at present and in the future. In opening he told how Professor Thurston at Cornell started a small society for Engineers. Although this society was rather small at the outset, it increased rapidly, and soon it became larger and the students at Cornell found that to be in good standing with their fellow engineers, they must become members. Out of this society grew the present Mechanical Engineering Society of the United States.

He then went on to say how difficult it is for some men to become members of this society until they accomplish some achievement of note in the engineering world. He spoke of the Student Engineering Society at Technology. This led, upon graduation, to junior membership, and finally, when they had become more advanced in their profession, to senior membership.

The senior membership enables one to get the valuable monthly periodicals of the Society. These periodicals represent years of study and research, and enable one to successfully continue in the field. Then, again, one obtains the advantages of acquaintance with the members of the society, which often leads to the securing of good positions. These members act, then, as advisers and helpers in his work. The membership in the society opens to one all factories and establishments for personal inspection. Professor Miller concluded by saying a few words about the monthly meetings of the Society, and he expressed great satisfaction because of the fact that Tech men took an active part in these meetings.
