To the Editor of The Tech:

As I have attempted to analyze the arguments for and against the Honor System at Technology and the elements for its success if adopted, I seem to notice that those elements are at times four, as follows:

First, the satisfactory working of the Honor System depends on whether some men are willing to make the sacrifice of leadership, who are willing to see the project hitherto administered irrespective of personal ease or popularity. The history of the possible success of undergraduate activities of Technology shows an abundance of evidence that we have that kind of men here.

Second, it depends upon the success of the honesty of the student body. That we have men of unusual spirit and sincerity is the purpose of the testimony of everyone acquainted with both Tech and other schools.

Finally, it depends upon the moral courage of some students in occasional instances. There have been remarkable examples of such courage among Tech students on certain occasions in the past, often, however, exhibited in such a quiet way that it has not attracted public attention, but enough to give us confidence that such men will rise to the occasion if necessary.

Fourth, it depends upon real college spirit. Here is where many weaknesses have been lacking. Perhaps we are in the freshman demonstration of the hour. It is true that the effort to work the Honor System here would do as much to develop college spirit and loyalty to the institution's ideals as anything I could conceive of.

The honor of the student body is at stake, not the honor of the individual. The Honor System is a student obligation and students Technology students will accept it as such and make it work for their Alma Mater. Furthermore, the effort to work the Honor System here would do as much to develop college spirit and loyalty to the institution's ideals as anything I could conceive of.

HAUGHTON REMAINS

Although no official announcement has been made, it was learned on post that Percy D. Haughton, the well-known basketball star, will remain on the Harvard staff and will continue to give his services to the men's athletic program. The reason for his decision is not known, but it is believed that Haughton has decided to stay for at least another year.
