With The Sophs In Maine

HARVARD TRAINING CAMP JOINED BY 100 YALE MEN
The Addition Will Be Present Estimated to 1900

The first detachment of the Yale men was announced to enroll in the Harvard reserve officers' training corps at a hurriedly arranged meeting in the Harvard freshman dormitories, which have been commandeered as barracks for the student officers. It is expected that the second batch of 250 men will arrive at the beginning of next week, bringing the Yale quota up to 100.

Arrangements whereby the Yale men were admitted to the work of the Harvard corps were settled at a recent conference between President Lowell of Harvard and President Eliot of Yale. The final decision was that the Yale men will be admitted among the different companies of the Harvard corps and will be distributed among the various of the crimson in the barracks. The Yale elements will continue the military work which they have been doing, and it is expected that the major part of the Harvard work will be taken care of by the Yale men.

While conducting his physical training classes, the West Point instructor shows the students how to execute the commands in a way to render instant obedience. It is in this subtle art that army instructors have been known to hide their most important movements with their most unimportant. This is the art of being ready in front of the work. This is the art of being ready in front of the work. This is the art of being ready in front of the work.

The plan is to give the students the most important qualifications of an officer. There has been a vast improvement in giving all the opportunity to satisfy the change of the Harvard corps. They will continue their artillery training at Cambridge, and, under Captain Dubois of the French army, besides taking the regular infantry drill, the men will be taught the minor elements of war.

One of the students is shown the band in the vicinity of the Harvard Country Club, while a detail was sent out to work on the extensive defensive buildings near Fresh Pond.

(Continued on page 2)