JAPANESE MISSION INSPECTS TWO GREAT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Imperial Envoy Are Shown Through Harvard's Buildings—Inspects Harvard's Libraries and Reviews Radio School

After the hours of the Japanese mission's visit, Harvard's President A. Lawrence Lowell gave a brief tour of Harvard's campus and buildings to the Japanese ambassador and his entourage, who were well received by Professor C. E. Peabody, head of the Department of Naval Architecture.

The party visited the libraries in the Widener Library and the Widener Memorial Library, where they were given a tour of the stacks and the rare book room. They also visited the physical science laboratories, including those for physics, chemistry, and biology.

The envoy, dressed in an American style, was accompanied by a Japanese official and a member of the Harvard staff. They were given a detailed tour of the facilities and were shown the various departments and research centers.

The Japanese envoy, who was accompanied by a large entourage, was impressed by the size and scope of the Harvard campus and the quality of its facilities. He was particularly interested in the libraries, which he described as "a treasure house of knowledge." He was also impressed by the radio facilities, which he said were "the envy of the world."
