PRESIDENT MACLAURIN DISCUSSES
NEW ENGLAND'S PROBABLE FUTURE AS NATIONAL EDUCATION CENTER

Speaks of the Late Colonel T. L. Livermore's Plans of Co-operation of Educational Institutions of New England States

SIX HUNDRED ATTEND DINNER

PRESIDENT RICHARD C. MACLAURIN told the members of the Alumni Association at the annual banquet held in the Walker Memorial Saturday night that Boston was a good place to stage the college in the realm of education even as they have lost in the realm of commerce; that he believes educational institutions will be the last to this section if it is dissipates its energies and scatters its forces.

Before making this prediction, the president said, "A few years ago, Professor Willard Straight of Cornell University, in his latest book, 'The College in the Making,' expressed the same bethought that universities are of less importance than the student himself, and that the future of education will depend on the outcome of the struggle between the university and the university, on the one hand, and the individual, on the other.

"In this struggle, the university is losing ground, and it is now evident that the individual is gaining. The university is now a thing of the past, and the individual is the future.

"The future of education will depend on the individual, and not on the university. The university is now a thing of the past, and the individual is the future."
