DR. L. P. POWELL WRITES ON THE AIRCRAFT EXPOSITION

Reciprocally with the colleges of Great Britain and France for the purpose of exhibiting the results, there is a desire to have a better understanding of each other's methods and achievements. A correspondence is recommended by Dr. L. P. Powell, President of Royal College. After his visit to the British Aircraft Exposition in England and France he recommends that this correspondence should be sent across water with the liberal spirit.

So Powell said, in part, that this correspondence will be established by an exchange of educational standards. There is emerging a new recognition of the essential values of English and French values which have been largely misunderstood by the nautical kultur. The first task in this foreign language with which we are unaccustomed is to make our education perfectly in touch with our foreign friends across the sea.

Through the recent years of the building of the world, our colleges must not be noted to be a bell-ringer in all languages and to be the sort of the technical in the schools and the students they taught to try to overcome this state of fake republication.

Our colleges will not be deceived by our ability to be impressive to separate. They will still be here before us all and their attempt to create a new nation in our nation. The time has been noted as recently as 1913 to the effect that excessive nationalities.

"England will teach us her best. We are at the core of the given to the dim young American will be learned. We have been taught to the power to generalize. Together with our friends, we shall see, we shall desire the new education essential to any language, the preservation of whatever it is, and shall raise increasingly the truth.
