The following article was written by a member of the junior freshman class, and we are printing it because we think it has the right idea.

Several members of the junior-freshman class have taken out papers for admission to the course in Coast Artillery, to fit them for enlisted specialists in the army.

The junior freshman class seems to be doomed to be a failure. It started as one of the smallest classes which ever entered the Institute, and the time it had gone through exams was even smaller. Now it seems to be decreasing again. This time it is not exams that are weeding it out, but rather the call of our Country. As this war has progressed, and we have seen more and more of our boys go into service there has been a great desire among many of us to see what it is like in "our " Service. We had been told time after time that we were doing a country a great service by being in the Institute instead of over there fighting a war, but we had never had a chance to see it. We had been told that boys of our age couldn't fight, but this is not so. Yet we heard many who were ignorant of our work and the future of our class, and the idea that we would serve in the army was a little too much. Now we are told that we will have the opportunity to fight the war, to do the things we have been discussing for years. The fellows started out to see if they could get into service. After the draft was brought up all existing enlistments were closed, for the very reason of keeping fellows who would not be needed in the service, and the few who were of more use in the colleges, iron mills. There was only one branch that could be found in which enlistments were still going on, that was the Coast Artillery Training Course. It seemed good enough, if there was nothing better, and the fellows took out their first papers. So far it was easy sailing, but when they went to see the Dean for a reference, he was not as glad to see them as they had expected. He told them that they were not very popular and that they might not stay in school, and that it was hard for him to think that there was not a very big chance of their getting in.

It may be that this enlistment of the students by the army is such an interesting idea that the students are so anxious to get in. The reason is that it is the first time they have an opportunity to do something for themselves and the country, where their efforts will be the only thing that is going to be done. They have not been able to do much for themselves before, but now they can do something. The war has given them an opportunity to do something for themselves, and they are going to take advantage of it.

WARRN A. STRANGMAN '20

In the Fall of 1914, Mr. Warren A. Strangman, '20, was detailed to the Great Western Depot sixth avenue, at York, Pennsylvania

The following article was written by a member of the junior freshman class, and we are printing it because we think it has the right idea. Several members of the junior-freshman class have taken out papers for admission to the course in Coast Artillery, to fit them for enlisted specialists in the army.

The junior freshman class seems to be doomed to be a failure. It started as one of the smallest classes which ever entered the Institute, and the time it had gone through exams was even smaller. Now it seems to be decreasing again. This time it is not exams that are weeding it out, but rather the call of our Country. As this war has progressed, and we have seen more and more of our boys go into service there has been a great desire among many of us to see what it is like in "our " Service. We had been told time after time that we were doing a country a great service by being in the Institute instead of over there fighting a war, but we had never had a chance to see it. We had been told that boys of our age couldn't fight, but this is not so. Yet we heard many who were ignorant of our work and the future of our class, and the idea that we would serve in the army was a little too much. Now we are told that we will have the opportunity to fight the war, to do the things we have been discussing for years. The fellows started out to see if they could get into service. After the draft was brought up all existing enlistments were closed, for the very reason of keeping fellows who would not be needed in the service, and the few who were of more use in the colleges, iron mills. There was only one branch that could be found in which enlistments were still going on, that was the Coast Artillery Training Course. It seemed good enough, if there was nothing better, and the fellows took out their first papers. So far it was easy sailing, but when they went to see the Dean for a reference, he was not as glad to see them as they had expected. He told them that they were not very popular and that they might not stay in school, and that it was hard for him to think that there was not a very big chance of their getting in.

It may be that this enlistment of the students by the army is such an interesting idea that the students are so anxious to get in. The reason is that it is the first time they have an opportunity to do something for themselves and the country, where their efforts will be the only thing that is going to be done. They have not been able to do much for themselves before, but now they can do something. The war has given them an opportunity to do something for themselves, and they are going to take advantage of it.

WARRN A. STRANGMAN '20

In the Fall of 1914, Mr. Warren A. Strangman, '20, was detailed to the Great Western Depot sixth avenue, at York, Pennsylvania