"The Little Journal" Says Cultural Subjects Are A Requisite of The Engineer.

There is no technical education which cannot stem somewhat from the scientific roots laid by the average layman and the majority of society is uncritical, and thus the Little Journal by Acton & Coburn, a publishing house in New York City, plans the following article of technical statements to relations on the question of how one can be a better teacher the logical steps which we take on to become a better teacher, or a better writer, etc.

This is not the time for a thorough discussion of the teaching philosophy, but the purpose of this article is to point out the fundamental nature of the problem. A teacher must have a thorough understanding of his subject matter in order to effectively communicate his knowledge to his students. He must also be able to express this knowledge clearly and concisely, using language that is both simple and precise. This will enable him to guide his students along the path of understanding and help them develop a deeper appreciation for the subject matter.
