E. M. Godshalk Jr.,

Wednesday, April 21, 1921

AN IMPRESSIVE ERROR

M. SHREWDOD EDDY, in his series of meetings in the past week seems to have accomplished one of his major ends, the exposure of the delusions of the modern socialite. He has without question stimulated thought on the problems which the undergraduate of the present day is doing, however, he has subjected himself to a certain amount of unjust criticism which arises from a misconception of his motives in the light of the student body. It is his message on the social and industrial problems of Europe and America which has aroused the greatest amount of interest and attention.

Mr. Eddy has on several occasions called a socialist and a communist. He repeatedly stated how

To The Editor of THE TECH:

the socialistic or the communist theory as a solution of the problem called a socialist and a communist. He repeatedly stated how so, I am sure that I, and I believe the socialistic or the communist theory as a solution of the problem called a socialist and a communist. He repeatedly stated how the socialistic or the communist theory as a solution of the problem called a socialist and a communist. He repeatedly stated how of delicate and vastly important questions of philosophy and politics. The American school of thought, I think, is making a vast difference in the thought which is being given to these matters, and the discussion which is taking place at present is a development which has been greatly needed.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the' nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.

Mr. Eddy's literature was brought to us in the form of pamphlets and articles, and when viewed in the light of his attitude which I have tried to expand may seem somewhat heinously and impractical, but I cannot apologize for it. I need only mention that these for the nature of our government, and the social system... and even the mind of man; on the contrary, he presented certain evils of our system, which I think should be kept in mind, and I think may be brought to the public in the interest of social structure.