WITHOUT any exaggeration whatever, we may safely say that the act of exaggeration is the most broadly cultivated, the most widely used, and, with the exception of editors and politicians, the most common of all the arts. Exaggeration has always been indulged in as a means of life.

The man who says, "don't exaggerate," would take away the greatest asset of our national morality. When he says, "don't exaggerate," he implies that all the great men of our country have been exaggerators.

But there is another way of looking at the matter. The adage, "Don't exaggerate," when he says, "don't exaggerate," he means that not all great men are exaggerators. And tell them that our presidents were all great men, and they will believe it.

The idea is that a great man is a great man because he is great, and not because he exaggerates. And if they are to believe that our presidents were all great men, they must believe that they are great because they exaggerate.
