Individualism of Youth in Europe

By John Rothschild

In the early days of the 19th century, when the Romantic Movement was at its height, individualism was the order of the day. The emphasis was on the individual, on the unique, on the individual's right to express his own thoughts and feelings. This trend continued well into the 20th century, with the rise of Jugendstil and Art Nouveau, and then with the arrival of the Modern Movement. But today, individualism is in decline, as we see in the growing emphasis on collective action and the desire for a more unified society. The question is, what will come next? Will we see a return to the individualist ideals of the past, or will we move in a new direction altogether?

The individualist school of thought is based on the idea that each person is unique and that each person has the right to live his own life in his own way. This school of thought is opposed to the idea of a collective will, and it is opposed to the idea of a single authority that tells everyone what to do. Instead, the individualist school of thought believes in the freedom of the individual to make his own choices and to pursue his own goals.
