The Care of Young Men in Modern American Educational Institutions

By Professor C. M. Spofford

A young man coming to our modern educational institutions faces many cases from a distant state or from another country. He finds himself for the first time free to regulate to a considerable extent his life. The obligations of home, the advice of old friends and acquaintances are often lacking, and in the college he is alone. All around him the college—its officials in students. He must help him in his new surroundings to guard against the college its officials, in students. He must help him in his new surroundings to guard against the difficulties, to furnish wholesome in- instutions, to guard against the difficulties, to furnish wholesome in-
