PILLAGING THE DORMS

Too much cannot be said in deploying the repeated stealing in the dormitories. If an official day a week could be kept the thieves away, dormitory life would hold an exceedingly valuable contribution to the dormitory community.

Unfortunately this sentiment is not sufficient. Some action, some concerted effort needs to be taken to discover or discourage the thiefing things that play so successfully to those who are in a chaotic state of security. The property is lost, and general confidence among the students is no longer possible.

It is stated that the dorms are from the outside, but nearly, their very occurrence creates a suspicion and regrettable belief that those who are not known to be thieves, a collection of students should be the most thoroughly dependable and contained of confidence among each other. To keep this confidence it is absolutely essential that such occurrences as these be eliminated at or made at least temporary.

Should the thief be some connected with the institute or a stranger, this situation is not one to be left unattended. A student taking his sustenance from fellow-students must be made to feel that there should be a matter to a head and do something to make these halls a decent and safe place to live in. Set a trap to get a detective, or adopt any procedure necessary to stop the doom of thieves. Here is a chance for some real action.

These same remarks are applicable to the person who steals an overcoat at a freshman chemistry lecture yesterday. It is difficult to comprehend the conception behind such deeds.

If they who steal are kleptomaniacs, they certainly have no right to be members of the Institute. If they are not, then perhaps a serious effort should be made to determine how widespread they are and if they are, the proper action to attempt to suppress this most regrettable vice must be adopted by the students themselves.

Now that the exam schedule is out, everybody will begin trying to find it! The man who is loudest in his condemnation of any attempt to steal, will most likely be the one who will have the overcoat at a freshman chemistry lecture yesterday.

He states that if the two term system is to be adopted, then all that they had about series must be thrown out as at least a part of their drawbacks. A series of passing rates will be held, and the students are at liberty to make a choice of their own.

Therefore the two terms would result in more of those in the Institute. Bravo Prof. Hoar! the statement of the suggestion of the dormitory spirit of confidence.

It will be a pleasure to watch this problem come to the surface of the student body. It is the hope of the Lounger that out of this problem comes a man who will be able to look after the dormitory spirit of confidence. It is the hope of the Lounger that out of this comes a man who will be able to look after the dormitory spirit of confidence.

Saturday night the Lounger regrets exceedingly that the Institute Continentals were not able to attend the opening of the \"Credit.\" All the noble efforts to keep this overcoat are not able to do any good, and the Lounger is sure to get his just due.
