TO PRAISE AND NOT TO DEFEND

Those familiar with the viewpoints of this column are aware of its unconventional and unorthodox outlook. With this, we adopt the position that American college athletics should be developed further.

Colleges, in general, have allowed themselves to be controlled by tradition, which, in many cases, is not necessarily in the best interest of the college as a whole. It would have been more beneficial for the institution to have developed in a more progressive manner, adapting its policies to the changing needs of the students.

It is refreshing to know that it is possible to break away from this tendency. It is gratifying to see that the college system has been protected from the realities of the modern world. The college, as it was established, was intended to be an institution where the students could study and learn. It should not be used as a means to promote a sport.

The college should be a place where the students can learn, not a place where they should be subjected to the pressures of a sport. The college should not be used as a means to promote a sport, but it should be used as a place where the students can learn.

In conclusion, the college should not be used as a place to promote a sport, but it should be used as a place where the students can learn and develop their potential. The college should not be used as a means to promote a sport, but it should be used as a place where the students can learn and develop their potential.

In conclusion, the college should not be used as a place to promote a sport, but it should be used as a place where the students can learn and develop their potential. The college should not be used as a means to promote a sport, but it should be used as a place where the students can learn and develop their potential.