S. PHILLIPSE STEPHENS

S. PHILLIPSE STEPHENS combined with the tastes of a scholar the desire and the power to make his accessions useful to others. The men who have eaten of the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes." The men who spoke to me in the last few days, in expressing their grief at his death, have inevitably mentioned the warm personal interest that he showed in his students, and have called to mind the individual class he taught. "He was a man who could give you an 'F,' and still like you." From his even temper and his cordial manner few could guess the possibility of a struggle and a conflict. "He was a study in extremes."