A GREAT loss to art was the death of John Singer Sargent, noted American painter and portraitist, at his home in Paris, France, on April 15, 1925. The news of his death was announced by President Hopkins of the Tech, who was the son of American parents and has produced a great deal of work in this country.

John Singer Sargent made his home in Boston, and just before his death he had completed arrangements to move to his native city. He was one of the greatest of this generation in his country. The splendid mural painting which decorates the Tec campus with the image of handiwork of Fine Arts is the work of his brush; and many fine examples of his portraits are to be seen in the latter buildings. Perhaps no artist of his generation has more claim to a right of immortality than he has. Even his enemies were for the most part concerned in criticising his life, or his choice of subjects. They seem to be playing a losing game which the next few decades will succeed to present conditions; of whether there will be set up concrete values of fraternities; it makes them less vitally necessary for the passing day brings nearer the date of their disintegration. For, with the Boston Globe. President Hopkins is in a position to make the best of his life, of his work in this country.
