UPPERCLASSMEN ARE NICE ENOUGH NOT TO ALOOF

The question one hears on all sides these days, is, "Why don't the freshmen and upperclassmen stop being aloof?" The answer is, "They stop being aloof when they start calling." But the question is pertinent. Are the freshmen beginning to call the seniors? Do they feel so secure in the college atmosphere that they can afford to relax and be friendly? What is the answer? Does the upperclassman feel that he has a right to be aloof? Is he afraid of being called a "snob"?

The question is not easy to answer. The freshmen are beginning to call the seniors. They are becoming more friendly and sociable. But the upperclassmen are not quite ready to accept this change. They are still a little too aloof. They are not quite ready to be friendly. They are still too much afraid of being called a "snob." But the freshmen are becoming more and more friendly. They are beginning to call the seniors. They are beginning to be friendly. The upperclassmen are beginning to be more friendly. They are beginning to call the freshmen. They are beginning to be friendly. They are beginning to be friendly.

As for the answer, it is, "They will be friendly when they start calling."
