A new form of debating has been inaugurated by the University of Vermont for the current year. The format is an eight-man team, consisting of four freshmen and four sophomores, with a cross-class debate. The debate is divided into two parts. The first part consists of an elimination debate, in which the eight-man teams are paired off. The winning team advances to the semifinals, and the losing team is eliminated. The semifinals consist of two debates, one between the first-place team and the second-place team, and the other between the third-place team and the fourth-place team. The winning team from each semifinal advances to the finals. The final debate is a one-on-one debate between the two remaining teams. The debate is judged by a panel of judges, who are typically members of the faculty or professional debate coaches. The debate is held in a formal setting, with a moderator and a set of rules. The debate is designed to test the ability of the teams to present their arguments in a clear and concise manner, while also demonstrating their ability to refute their opponents' arguments. The debate is typically held in a public setting, such as a school auditorium or a community center, and is open to the public. The debate is an important event for the University of Vermont, as it provides an opportunity for the students to engage in a high-level discussion of important subjects, while also showcasing the university's commitment to intellectual excellence. The debate is also an important event for the community, as it provides an opportunity for the community to engage in a high-level discussion of important subjects, while also showcasing the university's commitment to intellectual excellence.
