The Tech
Monday, April 1, 1929

FALLACY OF COPIOUS NOTES

The Open Forum
Boston, Massachusetts

The Editor of THE TECH
Walter Memel, Cambridge.

Dear Sir:

The following clipping is a subject which I believe, would be of interest to your paper and, especially important, I don't know how much you would be interested in this clipping and if you have one of these clipping's saved, I would have great

The fallacy of copious notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.

The essential feature of good notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.

The fallacy of copious notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.

The fallacy of copious notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.

The fallacy of copious notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.

The fallacy of copious notes is to record from the professor's text material. With this material, and not understand what he wrote, nor will he get anything from what follows.