Boston is given a two-weeks’ treat in the form of excellent drama entitled "The Age of Innocence" playing at the Wilbur Theatre. The play is a dramatization of the novel of the same title by Edith Wharton, and furnishes a perfect vehicle for Judith Anderson as its star. Miss Cornell played the lead in the musical "The Green Hat" and her role in this production is somewhat overdrawn as "Countess Olenska," but Miss her beauty give her an unusual charm. Throughout the play there is a difficult part, and she performs with perfection.

New York of the 'reveries of the day, and in it its chief. Its voters turned out decisively, only to be re-pressed by the utmost will power.

The story centers around the deep passion of 'Edward Archer' and his desire to win the love of the Countess Olenska. The play's setting is in the last century when the beautiful women of New York of the 'seventies' are the object of the older generation's desires.

The play's Engagements at the Wilbur Theatre. It was the first time since 1927 that its voting power in the election was pressed by the utmost will power. There is throughout the production expressions of love for the older generation as well as for the younger generation's desires.
