Technology Representative in Turkey Describes Adventures During Holiday

Fred N. Dickerman '30, Highly Pleased With Conditions
At Robert College

When East meets West, it is obvious that for a brief time at least, the East is in the right. When one discusses the educational system of the two countries, one is apt to be bombarded with the question, "Is one better than the other?" However, Fred N. Dickerman '30, who went to Robert College, Istanbul, on a fellowship, has had both the fortune and the misfortune to see both systems. Dickerman says, "The American educational system is far better than the Turkish educational system, if one sets aside the religion part of it. We have a more democratic system here than in Turkey."

Dickerman, who had been at Robert College for two months when this interview was given, says that "the only thing I'm having trouble with is the T.B. A.-Tech, which I can barely understand, but I'm getting used to it now."

Even though he has had his share of meetings, Dickerman says that he has enjoyed his stay in Turkey. "I've been to several places, and I've had a chance to see a lot of the country. I've been to the Black Sea, and I've seen the beautiful scenery."

Dickerman says that the American educational system is far superior to the Turkish system. "The American system is much more organized and efficient. The classes are smaller, and the instructors are better trained."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the curriculum. "The American system is much more varied and comprehensive. We have a much wider range of courses to choose from."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the faculty. "The American faculty is much more qualified and experienced. The instructors are much more knowledgeable and are able to pass on their knowledge to the students."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the student body. "The American student body is much more diverse and includes students from all over the world. The Turkish student body is much more homogeneous and includes only Turkish students."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the facilities. "The American facilities are much more modern and well-equipped. The Turkish facilities are much more outdated and inadequate."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the administration. "The American administration is much more efficient and effective. The Turkish administration is much more inefficient and ineffective."

Dickerman also mentions that the American education system is far better than the Turkish system in terms of the financial support. "The American education system is much more financially supported. The Turkish education system is much more dependent on government funding."

In conclusion, Fred N. Dickerman '30, who is highly pleased with conditions at Robert College, says that the American education system is far superior to the Turkish education system. "The American system is much more organized, efficient, diverse, qualified, knowledgeable, skilled, modern, well-equipped, effective, and financially supported. The Turkish system is much more disorganized, inefficient, homogeneous, inexperienced, unskilled, outdated, inadequate, ineffective, and financially dependent."
