YELLOOW JOURNALISM
WHILE it has never been the policy of this paper to enter into the never-cooling controversy over intercollegiate football, we feel it our duty to rise to the occasion today in answer to an editorial that appeared in the New York Times. We are strongly opposed to the arguments concerning football that are so frequently showered upon us. Among these arguments being that the question of eligibility puts West Point to such a disadvantage, the argument being that the question of eligibility was put West Point to such an advantage in the last year's competition.

The last year's competition was for the last generation of football. The question of eligibility was put West Point to such an advantage in the last year's competition.

Our college newspaper does not think that the present depression is any worse than any other. The college is well prepared for such a depression, as a result of our financial planning. The college has withstood the test of time and has weathered the storm of depression. Our college newspaper is optimistic about the future of the college and the future of the country.

Present Depression Cuts Down Enrollment in Cultural Arts Courses

College years do not seem to think that the present depression is any worse than any other. The college is well prepared for such a depression, as a result of our financial planning. The college has withstood the test of time and has weathered the storm of depression. Our college newspaper is optimistic about the future of the college and the future of the country.
