Prominent Professor Hits Present Examination System As "Unreliable"

Describing final examinations as "unsatisfactory in the judgment of an individual," a prominent textbook professor, who asked specifically that his name be withheld, in a special interview with The Tech, severely criticized the examination system as a means for grading students. In the words of the professor:

"The final examination gives the Faculty a good survey of the ability of a class as a whole, but are totally unsatisfactory as a means of grading individuals. After making grades with a man all year, I have a hard time of what he has accomplished and of what he knows beyond any examination can give me. I do not approve of giving a student an idea of what he has done a negligible amount of work all year, an opportunity to pull through by last minute cramming. On the other hand, it is not fair to work hard and receive a mediocre mark because of one poor day in the examination room. The marks are no different on paper from the others, it is easy to back up in examinations and use this as a time for realizing proficiency of class in the year."
