What's alive?

Passing practically unnoticed in the report of the first meeting of the Institute Committee was the approval of the request for the purchase of a key to the lock on the door of the in conduct of Field Day. This report on the part of the group of Juniors whose chief activity is extending the hospitality of the Institute to their classmates and making their stays in Cambridge more pleasant indicates that the body is alive and willing to lend aid in fields outside of which it was specifically formed.

An organization which never does anything soon becomes a dead organization. Witness the deceased Calumet Club. An active organization should and does require an active membership. The Beaver Key Society shows that it is alive, and by taking part in the administration of Field Day it will not only conserve its own active existence but render a real service to the manager of Field Day by assuming some of the duties and responsibilities connected with the conduct of the annual affair. The group should be commended for its voluntary service.

Possible danger

The report of the Saturday morning of those interested in a possible revival of Tech show this year indicates that there are some at the Institute who are enthusiastic about the project, even to the extent of contributing to a fund with which to begin operations. It may be able to interest more than just a few groups of students toward the making of such a show. To the few who have already committed themselves to the purchase of a show, it is a great relief that there be in conduct of Field Day. This report on the part of the group of Juniors whose chief activity is extending the hospitality of the Institute to their classmates and making their stays in Cambridge more pleasant indicates that the body is alive and willing to lend aid in fields outside of which it was specifically formed.

An organization which never does anything soon becomes a dead organization. Witness the deceased Calumet Club. An active organization should and does require an active membership. The Beaver Key Society shows that it is alive, and by taking part in the administration of Field Day it will not only conserve its own active existence but render a real service to the manager of Field Day by assuming some of the duties and responsibilities connected with the conduct of the annual affair. The group should be commended for its voluntary service.

Possible danger

The report of the Saturday morning of those interested in a possible revival of Tech show this year indicates that there are some at the Institute who are enthusiastic about the project, even to the extent of contributing to a fund with which to begin operations. It may be able to interest more than just a few groups of students toward the making of such a show. To the few who have already committed themselves to the purchase of a show, it is a great relief that there be in conduct of Field Day. This report on the part of the group of Juniors whose chief activity is extending the hospitality of the Institute to their classmates and making their stays in Cambridge more pleasant indicates that the body is alive and willing to lend aid in fields outside of which it was specifically formed.

An organization which never does anything soon becomes a dead organization. Witness the deceased Calumet Club. An active organization should and does require an active membership. The Beaver Key Society shows that it is alive, and by taking part in the administration of Field Day it will not only conserve its own active existence but render a real service to the manager of Field Day by assuming some of the duties and responsibilities connected with the conduct of the annual affair. The group should be commended for its voluntary service.

Possible danger

The report of the Saturday morning of those interested in a possible revival of Tech show this year indicates that there are some at the Institute who are enthusiastic about the project, even to the extent of contributing to a fund with which to begin operations. It may be able to interest more than just a few groups of students toward the making of such a show. To the few who have already committed themselves to the purchase of a show, it is a great relief that there be in conduct of Field Day. This report on the part of the group of Juniors whose chief activity is extending the hospitality of the Institute to their classmates and making their stays in Cambridge more pleasant indicates that the body is alive and willing to lend aid in fields outside of which it was specifically formed.

An organization which never does anything soon becomes a dead organization. Witness the deceased Calumet Club. An active organization should and does require an active membership. The Beaver Key Society shows that it is alive, and by taking part in the administration of Field Day it will not only conserve its own active existence but render a real service to the manager of Field Day by assuming some of the duties and responsibilities connected with the conduct of the annual affair. The group should be commended for its voluntary service.