The GREAT, NOBLE, AND GOOD

Once upon a time there was a group that considered itself the natural spirit of the undergraduate student body. It was the Committee, whose efforts the group created to maintain a good friendship within the student body and to promote the interests of the students.

In the opinion of the great, noble, and good purifiers, who considered themselves the guardians of the peace, the methods employed by the Committee were unwise and had broken the spell of good will. They had allowed the Committee to act without their consent, and their words had been used to justify their actions. The members of the Committee were harsh and had failed to appreciate the value of the good, noble, and good.

Then the Committee was called into question. Some members of the Committee had been accused of acting in a manner that was not in the best interest of the students. The Committee was forced to defend itself, and the truth was revealed.

Some students disagreed with the Committee, and they were harsh and critical of the methods used by the Committee. They were not willing to accept the fact that the Committee was acting in the best interest of the students.

The problem confronting the girls today is that they often do not have the opportunity to express their opinions. They are no longer allowed to participate in the decision-making process. The Committee does not necessarily endorse the opinions expressed.

The Committee is not in the position to prevent disturb-
