Society to Give Recognition to Aptitude in Fields of Pure and Applied Science

A chapter of the Sigma Xi fraternity, National Society for the Promotion of Science, will be established at Technology, according to an announcement made by the National Society last week. The action came as a result of a petition presented by the national organization, at its recent convention in Boston, of the petition submitted by members and associates of the Society who were on the faculty of the Institute.

Many Eligible for Membership

Professors, instructors, and graduate and undergraduate students in the fields of pure or applied science are eligible for membership according to the rules of the society. The acceptance of the petition has opened the chapter to any and all students, both men and women, who have the same significance of scholarship in a given field as that of the petitioners. At least thirteen students of the class of 1934 only. At least three students of the class of 1933 only.

Founded 45 Years Ago

Said in the Harvard College University in November, 1889, by Professors Charles E. B. Ayres, 19th, and Joseph H. girl, 19th, with the affection of the College of Columbia University as a society for the promotion of the advancement of the sciences. The college has about 200 active members.

“President of the group was John. M. Coles, 4th, and his first vice president was the late Charles E. B. Ayres, 19th, for whom the society is named. There were present at the meeting about 50 students, and there were appointed to teach the scientific subjects, establishing Franklin relations with the society.
