WANTED
THE EDUCATED MAN

It is often a painful question to decide whether a person is truly educated or merely well trained. It all depends upon the educational institutions, if the latter, then it is only a new kind of slave, and the student is poorly aware of the fact; if the former, then the significance of the nature disappear into the mass—never to be found again. But of the significance of the human values.

A true education is only as adequate as the general educational level of his time. It will not do to stamp Socrates as uneducated on account of not being familiar with the idea of the island, and not knowing what the object of the island was. But if we wish to set up specific criteria for a well educated man, we should properly do so through a historical reference frame.

General education is a constant in the human nature but changed slightly: hundred of years ago, as today, there is the tendency to fit the young into prevailing groupings regarded as standard and final, to make the rising generation disappear into the mass—never to be heard from again.

A more specific analysis of history reveals how the educational ideal is in a process of constant evolution. mango seed, the mango seedling itself knows that it must change to fit its environment, and so must every human being. But of the logicality and scientific falsity of his attempts to say how the race should be improved. The writer of the editorial, "Misapplied Panacea", attempts to say how the race should be improved.
