Author Of Novel Containing No "E's" Is Member Of Technology Class Of 89

Recently, when newspapers the country over carried the story of the strange novel without an "E," the Tech, taking note that Ernest V. White of the Tech, and the Junior College of the University of Arkansas, sought further information of the author. A letter to White, at his residence in a military home in California, brought forth the reply which is given below.

"1700 kilowatt motor generator was recently purchased by the Electrical Training Division for teaching purposes in the Engineering Department. The generator is in course of installation and will be housed in a special building to be erected on the campus of the school. The generator is being installed by the Philadelphia Electric Company, and the equipment will be made available for future use.

"The generator is designed to have an exceptional promise of being a valuable educational tool for the preparation of students for the profession and for the development of their abilities. Students, selected on the basis of their academic standing and their promise in the profession and in the future, will be given an opportunity to work with the equipment and to become familiar with its operation.

"The system is designed to develop originality, intellectual courage, and mental activity.

Graduate Student Kimball Has Taken Miles Of Movies In Many Countries

Shooting with a camera is all the rage among the youthful students who want to be. Curtiss V. Kimball, a graduate at the Institute of Physics, claims that although he has taken many of the great shots of the wild game in Africa and South America, the best and most difficult shots have been those that have been done for rabbits. Kimball, who is 30 years old, has been shooting with a camera professionally for many years. He has been shooting with a camera since he was 16 years old.

In the course of taking his movies, Kimball, who is a well-known photographer, has set up many of his cameras in dangerous spots and has met with some strange encounters. He tells his stories of his camera in Kansas City and of the wild game he has been shooting. He has been shooting with a camera since he was 16 years old.
